About me

Service and interaction designer

Service and Interaction Designer from the Oslo School of Architecture and Design (AHO), with expertise in service design, strategic design, systems thinking, product development, branding, and user-centred innovation. Throughout my studies, I have collaborated with organisations such as NAV, the City of Oslo, MUNCH, and other public and private-sector organisations to develop forward-looking services and solutions.

I am motivated by understanding complex challenges and translating insights into holistic, user-friendly, and feasible solutions. I work in a structured and analytical manner, both independently and as a part of interdisciplinary teams, and actively use creativity, visualisation, and prototyping throughout the design process. I also have experience using artificial intelligence as a tool for research and insight generation, ideation, concept exploration, and streamlining workflows.

Education

August 2021 -
June 2026

Oslo School of Architecture and Design (AHO)

Master's Degree in Design

Master's Thesis

"To Understand and Be Understood" - Master's project at AHO.

Explored how women from ethnic minority backgrounds experience communication and interaction when meeting with general practitioners. The project resulted in the development of three digital tools designed to be integrated into Helsenorge, Norway's national health portal, to strengthen communication, understanding, and patient involvement during consultations. The project received highly positive feedback from an external examination panel, which highlighted the insight-driven process, methodological rigour, and quality of execution: "It demonstrates a bold design process where insights and testing guide the direction. This is a thorough project with strong craftsmanship". A full project description, design process, and additional projects are available in my portfolio: <https://www.martinebraathen.com>.
